Meeting the challenges of Agriculture and Forestry with Commissioner Bob Odom

LSUAgCenter economists have pegged weather damage to Louisiana's four largest crops at $441 million and climbing.

"My prediction in early October of crop losses in the $300 million to $500 million range may be too conservative," Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom said. "The rains keep coming, farmers can't get in the fields with their machinery and what's left to harvest is in bad shape."

After the passage of Tropical Storm Isidore and Hurricane Lili, Odom had predicted as much as a $500 million loss to Louisiana farmers.

Since, however, the rains have scarcely let up and the damage has continued to mount.

At $338 million in losses from a preharvest estimated value of $687 million, the value of Louisiana's 2002 sugarcane harvest has fallen by half.

Sugarcane fields are a quagmire. Mangled and matted cane stalks are difficult to pick up and cut. The harvested stalks are covered in mud. Muddy stalks at the mills are causing equipment problems as well as sugar extraction and quality problems.

So far, damage estimates from AgCenter economist Kurt Guidry are that $52 million in cotton and $41 million in soybeans have been lost. In addition, losses are set at $9 million for second crop rice, $9.2 million for sweet potatoes and $2.7 million for hay and forage.

"Only two-thirds of cotton and soybeans have been harvested. Normally this time of year both crops are near 100 percent harvested," Odom said. "Just before Tropical Storm Isidore and Hurricane Lili struck over a month ago, about 60 percent of the cotton had been harvested. A month later the figure has increased only a few percentage points."

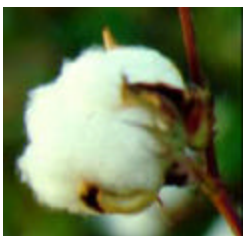

"In the last few days the weather has cleared, permitting dawn to dark harvesting in the cotton areas. But with field conditions and crop quality so poor, the equipment is getting torn up and the cotton quality will mean a severe price discount," Odom said.

An added burden to the cotton industry is the lack of quality seed from the harvested cotton. Normally, cotton gins receive the cottonseed as payment for their ginning costs.

The AgCenter says, "quality damage has essentially eliminated any revenue from seed sales. Given that gins rely heavily on seed sales to compensate the cost of ginning cotton, this reduction of revenue will likely place additional financial stress on the ginning industry."

"I can see the current relatively modest loss figures for cotton and soybeans climbing substantially when final figures are tallied," Odom said.

Cotton is normally a $300 million to $400 million crop and soybeans usually generate about $125 million in economic impact each year.

Cottonseed meal and cottonseed hulls are plentiful in our state and may be obtained directly from a cotton gin or cottonseed oil mill. Cotton gins are located in most parishes along the Red River and in the northeast. For a list of those supplying cottonseed, call the Louisiana Cotton Association at 318-398-0960.

Many people are aware of the advantages of feeding cottonseed meal or hulls. The extra protein from cottonseed cake or meal supplements can increase intake and digestibility of low quality forages. Cottonseed hulls are exceptional roughage with a high level of effective fiber and are very palatable. Whole cottonseed is a cost-efficient source of protein, energy and fiber for ruminant animals.

2002 State Fair of Louisiana

Louisiana's multi-faceted agriculture and forestry industries were showcased during the 2002 State Fair of Louisiana held in Shreveport Oct. 18-Nov. 3.

Children from throughout northwest Louisiana visit the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry pavilion at the State Fair of Louisiana. Students were invited to watch agriculture at work in demonstrations that included bees making honey, the milking of dairy cows and baby chicks hatching in an incubator. Samples of Louisiana sweet potatoes, pecans and cheese were available for tasting.

Termite research site established at Port Sulphur

LSU AgCenter scientists are gearing up to participate in the search for alternatives to keep termites – particularly Formosan subterranean termites – from literally eating people out of house and home.

The search is even more critical these days, because an important termite-preventing wood treatment soon will be taken off the market. Long the predominate wood preservative, chromated copper arsenate – CCA – will no longer be available by 2004, according to a leading termite expert with the LSU AgCenter.

Dr. Gregg Henderson, a professor of entomology, said the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has determined CCA is too dangerous to use, so the search is on for replacements.

“This has created a void of products that can replace it adequately,” Henderson said, adding, “Research is more important than ever.”

Anticipating that chemical companies and wood treatment companies will need research assistance, the LSU AgCenter is establishing a termite research site at its Citrus Research Station at Port Sulphur.

The field site will be used to evaluate new wood treatments, Henderson said, adding that the south Louisiana location will be the only one in the continental United States. A similar project is being conducted in Hawaii.

colonies,” Henderson said. “We don’t want to bring termites to someplace they haven’t already infested.”

Henderson said the area around Port Sulphur in Plaquemines Parish is one of the heavier infested parts of the state because it’s near the Mississippi River and near the port areas where the Formosan subterranean termites originally came into the country in shipping containers from the South Pacific after World War II.

“Our selection criteria included having termites already in the area, security for the experiments and a long-term guarantee that the research would continue,” he said. “This site fills the bill.”

Henderson said the 10-acre site selected for the research project is far enough from buildings and potential construction the researchers don’t have to worry that the insects will move to other structures.

He also pointed out the area has no street lights to lure flying termites that swarm every spring looking for places to establish new nests. “We can put up lights and keep them in the area,” he said.

Henderson said the basic arrangement of the project involves burying crates of termites in the ground and then providing them with a variety of wood samples treated with different chemicals.

The crates – which are plastic milk crates – are initially filled with 44 sticks of wood 1 inch high by 1 inch wide by 12 inches long.

The wood-filled crates are buried in an area known to be infested by Formosan subterranean termites. Then the crates are dug up later, and the soil and wood inside are filled with termites.

“We’ve collected as many as 60,000 termites in a crate in one week,” Henderson said.

At the research site, the crates are buried in the center of a series of 16-foot-long pieces of 2-by-4 lumber that radiate out from the center, the entomologist explained. The longer pieces of lumber serve as pathways for the termites to travel to different wood samples placed beside them.

After luring the termites to different samples, the scientists will evaluate how well the different treatments work. The researchers hope to find treatments that will repel the termites and prevent them from eating the wood.

“We want to develop strategies to control the termites,” Henderson said. “Our most important goal is to keep them away from the food source, to either kill or repel them with wood treatments.”

Henderson said that because of the new program, “We’re going to be some of the first to find out what works.”

The LSU AgCenter scientist explained that the project may include experiments that make certain wood attractive to termites to bring them to baits.

In the long run, he said, he expects chemical companies and wood processors to support the research with grants and payments for evaluating their products.
